Business Resilience (BR) is an organization's ability to anticipate, prepare for, respond to, and adapt to internal and external disruptions to maintain or quickly return to normal operations. BR is not a one-time event or a single strategy but a holistic approach to building an organization's capacity to handle disruption. BR begins by understanding the organization's current state of operations and then developing a comprehensive plan for identifying potential risks, vulnerabilities, and threats to operations. The aim includes assessing financial, operational, and human resources and the internal systems, processes, and structures that disruption would impact. Once identified, the organization can develop plans to mitigate the risks and build a more resilient infrastructure. Organizations can also incorporate resilience into their day-to-day operations by focusing on training, education, and communication. This requires training employees to recognize, respond to, and manage disruption and providing education and resources on strengthening organizational resilience. Clear and consistent communication between all stakeholders is also essential for building a resilient organization, as it helps ensure everyone is aware of risks and understands the organization's response plans.
